Voting rights after prison

Voting rights after prison

Registering to vote after a felony conviction is not as simple as completing a voter registration form. The right to vote varies state by state, and in many states, a criminal conviction has serious consequences for a citizen's ability to participate on Election Day.

Only Maine, Vermont and (as of July 7, 2020) Washington, D.C. never bar citizens from voting--even those who are in prison are eligible to vote. In the remaining forty-eight states, a person convicted of a felony loses the right to vote at some point during the justice process. Formerly incarcerated citizens may have their right to vote restored through one of two ways. Some states automatically restore the right to vote once all requirements are met. In others, a formerly incarcerated person must apply to have their voting rights restored.

We wanted to know how much assistance states and non-government organizations provide to help formerly incarcerated citizens understand and use their voting rights. Specifically, we wanted to know how their websites communicate to individuals that they are eligible to vote, and how they explain the rights restoration process to citizens who are not yet eligible.

To get a sense of what information is readily available, we started with Google searches that a typical person might use. Using basic, search terms with common phrases such as "I have been convicted of a felony, can I vote in California?" or "Can I vote in Illinois?" We wanted to see what information a person recently involved in the justice system might see online. We focused on four states--California, Illinois, Maine, and Mississippi--because they offered a range in:

- rights restoration policies
- geographic locations
- population demographics
- population density

In three of these states, Illinois, Maine, and Mississippi, the state published a webpage on the Secretary of State's website designed to help voters. However, these websites provided only a small amount of information for voters with criminal convictions. Worse, the information that was included on these websites was vague and confusing making them difficult to use. In some cases, the information was hard to find on the website meaning that many users could be at risk of missing it. Without clear guidance from the state, our citizens are at risk of falling victim to misinformation, missing an opportunity to vote, or attempting to vote when they should not.

Misinformation as voter suppression?

When information for voters is missing or hard to find, it becomes an added barrier that can keep people from voting. Without clear information, many are completely unaware that they are eligible to vote, while others might fear that if they register to vote they might be committing election fraud. This was the unfortunate consequence that a Texas woman, Crystal Mason, faced after casting a provisional ballot in the 2016 general election. Mason had never been told that because she was on federal supervised release, Texas considered her ineligible to vote. On election day, she arrived at her polling place and completed a ballot like she had always done in previous elections. Mason only learned that she was not eligible to vote six months later when she was arrested. The government's failure to communicate with Mason has resulted in her receiving a five-year sentence for fraudulently voting.

Information that is not explicitly clear jeopardizes citizens' voting rights, and also their freedom, by leaving important questions unasked or unanswered. This type of misinformation runs the risk of morphing into a form suppression because a right someone does not know about, is not a right that can be used. Without explicit and clear information for our justice-involved citizens, we help to perpetuate the misinformation that has created a system of de facto disenfranchisement.

A 2018 article published by Mississippi Today highlights how foggy communication can allow misinformation and de facto disenfranchisement to thrive. In Mississippi, the state strips citizens of their right to vote if they are convicted of one of 22 felonies. According to the article, Jed Blackerby always understood that his conviction for aggravated assault barred him from voting. However, aggravated assault is not one of the crimes that bars a person from voting. Years later, after learning that he had been eligible to vote the whole time, Blackerby told Mississippi Today that “No one gave any guidance....a long time ago when convicted felons, point blank, were not allowed to vote, (government officials) never made it public until afterwards that (people with) certain types of convictions were allowed to vote. It had never been publicized.”

Jed’s comments encapsulate a pattern that is clear in our Google searches. Information about voting rights for previously incarcerated people is not well-publicized. Further, what is publicized by the states that we studied is often buried deep in government websites where it is difficult to find. When the information can be found, it is frequently confusing, leaving the would-be voter to guess whether or not they are eligible to register.

Information available online

To explore just how difficult, it is to learn whether someone is eligible to vote, we looked at what is easily available on the web through Google searches. General search terms can lead voters to some tools and websites that help explain rights clearly. However, there are also many websites that are highly confusing and become a barrier to understanding voting rights.

Information from advocacy organizations

To gain a broad overview, we started with general search terms. On one of the first searches we used the term, "restore my voting rights." From this search we found a tool published by the Campaign Legal Center.

Restore Your Vote: I have a felony conviction. Can I vote?

Many people wonder "can I vote with a felony conviction?" and assume the laws have restricted their rights. But that's not true! While many states have some restriction on felon voting rights, most states restore the right to vote to citizens after they complete their sentences. In fact, up to 18 million Americans with past convictions can vote RIGHT NOW – they just don't know it – because the felony disenfranchisement laws in every state can be confusing.

With the help of this website, you will no longer have to wonder whether you have the right to vote and will no longer have to ask, "can I restore my right to vote?" If you are a United States citizen, you can answer the key questions below about your conviction(s) and determine if you are eligible to vote right now, or eligible to go through the process to restore your right to vote.

Please know that using this website is completely anonymous. We do not capture any information about you.

Sample of the questions on the Campaign Legal Center, starting with the state where you want to vote (<https://campaignlegal.org/restoreyourvote>)

The Campaign Legal Center tool is located on a page called Restore Your Vote. The tool asks the user a series of short and friendly yes or no questions. The page is designed so that the next question only appears after the previous has been answered. A feature that prevents the user from becoming overwhelmed.

After completing the first four questions a call to action appears with a prompt to visit the Vote.org website to register to vote. The call to action link sends users to the Vote.org website to register to vote.

The CLC site uses the same format for all fifty states. Slightly different questions are asked for each state to ensure that the site is providing accurate information for each state. The CLC Restore Your Vote tool provides a simple answer to the question of whether someone is eligible to vote. However, one downside is that the site is only optimized for general search terms and voters who search specifically for their state might miss it.

The CLC website clearly answers both questions that we are looking for. For voters who are eligible to vote, the call to action informs them that they are eligible to register. For voters who are not currently eligible, a similar message appears telling the user at what point they will become eligible to register.

Illinois voting rights page from the Illinois Legal Aid website.

The screenshot shows a webpage from Illinois Legal Aid. The main heading is "CAN I VOTE IF I HAVE BEEN CONVICTED OF A FELONY?". Below the heading is a rating section with five stars and the text "No votes yet". The main content area contains the following text: "In Illinois, if you have spent time in jail or have a criminal record, you still have the right to vote. Once you are no longer in the custody of the Illinois Department of Corrections, your right to vote is automatically restored. If you have previously lost your right to vote because of a felony conviction, you will need to re-register to vote once you have been released from prison." Below this text is a section titled "When am I able to vote?" which states: "If you have been accused of committing a felony, or have been convicted of a felony, you may still have the right to vote. As long as you are no longer in the custody of the Illinois Department of Corrections, you have the right to vote. You have the right to vote if:" followed by a bulleted list: "• Your case is in court, and no verdict has been given yet; • You are being held in jail while your case is in court, and no verdict has been given; • You are on probation; or • You are on parole." On the left side, there is a sidebar with a "Citizens & Immigration" header and a "RELATED" section containing a link to "Voting by mail basics (Text article)". At the bottom of the page, there is a "Feedback" button and a "Chat With Us" button.

<https://www.illinoislegalaid.org/legal-information/can-i-vote-if-i-have-been-convicted-felony>

Under a google search for the state of Illinois, we found a second non-government organization called Illinois Legal Aid. Illinois Legal Aid managed a webpage called Can I Vote if I Have Been Convicted of A Felony? On the page, a few short paragraphs were supplied that provided information about who is eligible to vote after a felony conviction.

Like the Campaign Legal Center's tool, Illinois Legal Aid also clearly answers both questions that we focused on for this project. The second line of the page reads:

"Once you are no longer in the custody of the Illinois Department of Corrections, you have the right to vote."

While the CLC page and Illinois Legal Aid use vastly different styles of conveying information to formerly incarcerated individuals, both clearly communicate whether or not a person is eligible to vote. In addition, both pages inform those who are not eligible to vote when and how they can have their right to vote restored.

Information from government websites

Looking at state elections or Secretary of State websites, the amount and usefulness of information concerning voting rights for people with a felony conviction is highly variable. Each of the four states we studied--California, Illinois, Maine, and Mississippi--serve as examples.

California

Do you have a criminal conviction? You may be eligible to vote.

Please respond to the statements below to determine if you may be eligible to vote.

<input checked="" type="checkbox"/>	I am a United States citizen and a resident of California.	<input checked="" type="checkbox"/> Yes <input type="checkbox"/> No
<input checked="" type="checkbox"/>	I will be 18 years old or older on election day.	<input checked="" type="checkbox"/> Yes <input type="checkbox"/> No
<input checked="" type="checkbox"/>	I am currently in state or federal prison or on parole for the conviction of a felony.	<input type="checkbox"/> Yes <input checked="" type="checkbox"/> No
<input checked="" type="checkbox"/>	I have been found mentally incompetent to vote by a court.	<input type="checkbox"/> Yes <input checked="" type="checkbox"/> No

You are eligible to vote. Please register here.
For more information about voting with a criminal conviction, please see Voting rights: Persons with a criminal history

California Secretary of State web page for would-be voters with a criminal conviction <https://www.sos.ca.gov/elections/restore-your-vote/>

California made the process of finding voter rights information for formerly incarcerated citizens clear and simple for two reasons. First, the page was easy to find. It was the first result on google.

Second, the tool provided by California was almost identical to the Campaign Legal Center's Restore Your Vote page. Just like CLC, California answers both "Am I eligible to vote?" and "When will I become eligible to vote?" The call to action at the bottom of the page encourages those who are eligible to vote to register. Similarly, for those who are not eligible, the page explains when their status will change.

Further, for the people of California, this tool is particularly useful because it is on a state website. Having this tool available on the state website is important because it can be used to combat misinformation and reassure users that the information is accurate.

WELCOME TO THE ILLINOIS ONLINE VOTER REGISTRATION APPLICATION WEBSITE

The registration period for the online voter registration system will close at 11:59 PM on 10/18/2020 and will reopen on 11/05/2020

TO VOTE IN ILLINOIS:

- You must be a United States Citizen.
- You must be 17 years old on or before the date of the Primary Election and turn 18 on or before the date of the General or Consolidated Election.
- You must live in your election precinct at least 30 days prior to Election Day.
- You must not be serving a sentence of confinement in any penal institution as a result of a conviction.
- You may not claim the right to vote anywhere else.

Illinois Secretary of State website page on voter registration

<https://ova.elections.il.gov/>

On the Illinois Secretary of State’s website, the most detailed information that we could find for voters who had previously been incarcerated was provided under the online registration page along with the voter qualifications. The page did not link to any further information, so we searched the website and quickly became lost. After twenty minutes of searching, we were unable to find any further information on the state’s website.

With so little information easily available on the website, many voters who have been involved in the justice system may struggle to learn about and exercise their right to vote. The bullet for voters with criminal convictions is troubling because it reads:

“You must not be serving a sentence of confinement in any penal institution as a result of a conviction”

This sentence is not written in plain language which may make it hard for many readers to decipher exactly what it means.

- There is no explicit mention to current incarceration or previous incarceration.
- It makes no distinction between felony, misdemeanor, or pretrial incarceration.

- Legal terms like “a sentence of confinement” may not be easy to understand, even for someone who is involved in the criminal justice system.
- The sentence opens with “you must not be” which could be confusing to many readers. Adjusting the sentence structure so that it reads “If you are currently incarcerated....” can help make it less confusing.

This means that many citizens involved in the justice system who are eligible to vote, can easily misunderstand or struggle to understand their voting rights. The state also fails to offer any further guidance to previously incarcerated individuals largely leaving the justice involved community to navigate the voting process with little assistance.

The Illinois page can be used to answer the question of whether or not a person is eligible to register, however, the way the information is presented can make answering this question difficult. Illinois differs from the websites discussed above in that it requires more work from the user to answer the questions. For example, CLC, California, and Illinois Legal Aid each tell the user explicitly who is eligible, who is not, and at what point a person will become eligible. The Illinois Secretary of State page only explains when a person cannot vote and requires the user to figure out the rest on their own.

Maine does not strip any individual of their voting rights, no matter what they are convicted of. Searching the phrase, “restore my voting rights, Maine” only generated information explaining felon disenfranchisement including information from the National Council of State Legislatures and Nonprofit Vote. We realized that since Maine never bars anyone from voting, using the term “restore my rights” was not the best option. However, this speedbump that we encountered during our research underscores an issue that many voters could be struggling with. Even with a common search term like “restore my voting rights,” we were not directed to any website that had further information. Voters who are unaware that Maine does not strip citizens convicted of felonies of their voting rights could spend large amounts of time searching for information about a right they never lost. This produces an additional barrier to voting that could be impacting thousands of people who are residents of Maine.

We adjusted our search and used the term “What are my voting rights in Maine?” Still, we struggled to find clear information. We were first brought to the Secretary of State’s website which was difficult to navigate. In addition to being unfriendly for the user, the page makes no explicit mention that incarcerated citizens may vote. The lack of explicit information makes it difficult to easily determine who can vote in the state, even when every adult resident of Maine is eligible to vote regardless of criminal history.

Like the Illinois Secretary of State page, the Maine website also requires the user to read between the lines. The site provides three bullets laying out who can vote in the state. None of these bullets makes any mention to people who have previously been incarcerated. Since it is not listed as a disqualifying factor, a voter can deduce that they are eligible to vote from these, but the website makes no explicit mention that anyone can vote regardless of their criminal past.

Mississippi

Mississippi’s Y’all vote <https://www.sos.ms.gov/vote/Pages/default.aspx>

Finally, a search in Mississippi only returned a handful of local news articles. When I went to the Secretary of State’s website, I was directed to the State’s voter information center, a website titled, Y’all vote.

DISENFRANCHISING CRIMES

Based upon the most recent Attorney General’s Opinion dated July 9, 2009, directed to The Honorable Wallace Heggie, the following comprise disenfranchising crimes:

- | | |
|-----------------------|--|
| 1. Arson | 12. Obtaining Money or Goods under False Pretenses |
| 2. Armed Robbery | 13. Perjury |
| 3. Bigamy | 14. Rape |
| 4. Bribery | 15. Receiving Stolen Property |
| 5. Embezzlement | 16. Robbery |
| 6. Extortion | 17. Theft |
| 7. Felony Bad Check | 18. Timber Larceny |
| 8. Felony Shoplifting | 19. Unlawful Taking of Motor Vehicle |
| 9. Forgery | 20. Statutory Rape |
| 10. Larceny | 21. Carjacking |
| 11. Murder | 22. Larceny Under Lease or Rental Agreement |

Mississippi Disenfranchising crimes <https://www.sos.ms.gov/Elections-Voting/Documents/SummaryofAttorneyGeneralOpinionsonElectionIssues.pdf>

The Y’all vote page was packed with almost any information that a Mississippi resident would need in order to learn about voting. However, the website lacked information regarding voting rights for previously incarcerated citizens. Under the tab titled Disenfranchising Crimes, I was brought to a pdf document (shown above). The document simply lists the 22 crimes that result in permanent disenfranchisement. There was no information about what disenfranchisement means, who is still eligible to vote, or how to have your rights restored. For a state that has an online voter information center, it is concerning that hardly any information is proved to the thousands of citizens who may be interested in voting after completing a sentence for a felony conviction.

Mississippi falls short of answering both questions. Like in Maine, the user is required to make determinations about their right to vote by reading between the lines. However, the information provided by the Y’all vote page is even more vague. While Maine tells the reader, who can vote and requires the voter to deduce that criminal convictions are not a prohibiting factor, Mississippi provides a list of 22 crimes that “comprise disenfranchising crimes.” The State does not tell the voter whether this list is exhaustive, or how a citizen who has been disenfranchised can have their rights restored. The only thing that the user can know for certain is that if they have been found guilty of one of the 22 crimes, they lose the right to vote for at least some point of time.

Conclusion

Overall, this study illustrates how much variance there is in the way different states publicize voter information for their citizens who have been involved in the justice system. However, the story of Jed Blackerby shows the adverse effects that we expose formerly incarcerated citizens to when we fail to provide clear and concise information. Struggling to learn about your voting rights, is not an issue that only impacts the individual. If the problem is widespread enough, its repercussions can ripple out, impacting the broader community.

Citizens who have been incarcerated and the communities which they return too are at a higher risk of being impacted by voter misinformation. As we have explored above, voters who have been incarcerated, do not always have the easiest path to registering to vote. In addition, the process of reentering the community after a period of incarceration is challenging. Many formerly incarcerated citizens struggle to get their feet on the ground and become active members of society. By encouraging our formerly incarcerated citizens to vote, we can alleviate some of the burdens that accompany reentry and help our justice-involved citizens take a meaningful stake in society. Publishing clear information that is specific to voters who have been incarcerated is about more than helping a specific set of people vote. It is about creating communities that are home to flourishing democracies.

Below the header is a navigation menu with the following items: Voter information, Registering to Vote, Voting at a Polling Place, Absentee Voting, Accessible Voting, College Students, Language Support, Overseas Voters, Justice-involved Voters, and Frequently Asked Questions. The 'Registering to Vote' section is active and contains the following text:

Registering to Vote

Am I eligible to vote?

- Are you a United States citizen
- Do you live in the State of Hamilton?
- Are you at least 18 years old?
- If you have been convicted of a felony, are your voting rights restored?

To learn about voting after being convicted of a crime, please visit the Information guide for voters with felony convictions.

If you have answered yes to all these questions, you can vote! Follow the steps to register below.

To make this information useful:

- Make the information clearer by listing the voter qualifications in a question format. This also eliminates the need to have negative requirements
- Include a clear, descriptive link to a page for voters with a criminal history.
- Include a link for restoration of rights information. Putting this in the navigation menu with other special audiences will ensure that it is easy to find.

About Mark D’Ostilio

Through his background studying criminology and history, Mark has developed a passion for understanding inequalities in America. Granted the Nevins Fellowship through the McCourtney Institute for Democracy, Mark put his passion to use at the Center for Civic Design.

Mark’s work focused on voting rights for citizens who have been incarcerated. His project studies how advocacy organizations and state governments publish information about voting rights and how they can better meet the needs of citizens who have been incarcerated

About Center for Civic Design

We believe that democracy is a design problem.

Across all of our projects, our research suggests that the voter journey—all of the information, decisions, interactions that get a voter from an intention to vote to actually casting a ballot—is a story of seemingly small barriers that can add up to a vote not cast.

We bring civic design skills in research, usability, design, accessibility, and plain language to improve the voting experience, make elections easier to administer, and encourage participation in elections. Through our work, we have helped hundreds of election officials build their skills and capacity, and touched millions of voters in small but important ways.
